About Brain Injury

Brain injuries can happen to anyone. They do not discriminate between races, age groups or genders. Motor vehicle accidents, falls, sports injuries, domestic violence and substance abuse are among the major causes. Some injuries are very severe and others are mild. Concussion are a mild form of brain injury and are very common. Remember that even the slightest brain injuries can bring about drastic changes in a person. Some injuries are so minor that the person does not require medical attention and the injury remains undetected for a long period of time. Regardless of the degree of injury, it is important to be aware of how a person's brain can change.

Many survivors physically appear to be as they were before the injury. Cognitive deficits (memory, organization, motivation, processing speed, etc.) and personality changes are what typically manifest, however these changes often are not acknowledged as results from the injury. It is difficult for people close to the survivor to recognize deficits because on the "outside" the person appears to have "recovered". This give the impression that the survivor should also be acting and speaking as they would have before experiencing the injury. Although a person can have a medical recovery, it is unlikely pre-injury cognition will completely return.

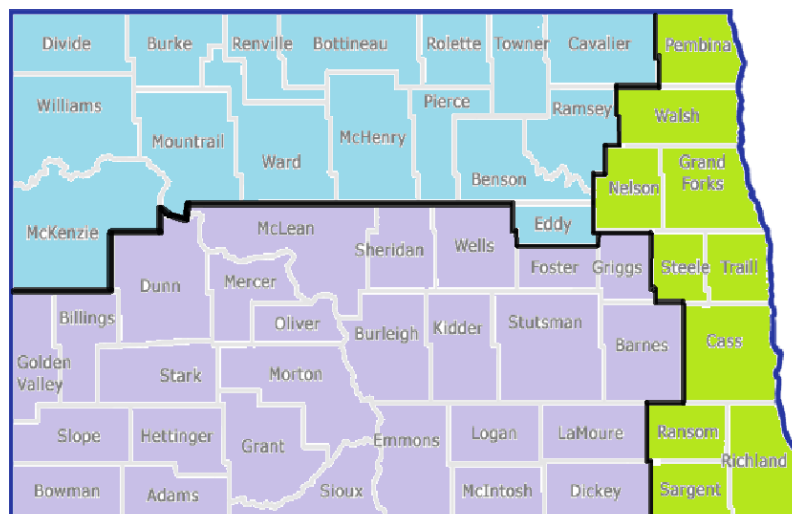

After suffering a brain injury, medical and psychological issues are usually associated. Seizures are a common neurological effect, but other systems in the body such as the digestive, respiratory and cardiological, can be just as impacted. Mental illness and substance abuse are also very common following brain injury. Negative feelings, attitudes and poor coping skills can result from not only the realization of the injury severity but difficulties with being accepting of post-injury life

About the North Dakota Brain Injury Network (ND BIN)

The North Dakota Brain Injury Network (ND BIN) is a statewide program that advocates for people following a brain injury. Resource facilitators for the ND BIN help people with brain injury, their families and providers find answers to questions, receive ongoing support and gain access to services. Staff can provide you with information and training about brain injury, assistance with locating and applying for services, referrals to pre-employment training, on the job supports and support groups. For more information, contact a resource facilitator in your region
